

I didn't have a clue what he was on about.

Yet this was my dad, and he was my hero, so if he was excited I figured I should be too.

I'm guessing my old man didn't have a grand plan when he gave me that share. In fact, it may well have been something he did on the spur of the moment because he didn't have any shrapnel in his pocket.

But it doesn't matter how it came about; what matters is that in one moment my life was changed.

That day kicked off what has become a lifelong interest in money . . . and here I am today, writing this book.

That's the power we have as parents.

‘If I only knew then what I know now . . .’

How often do you hear people say:

‘If I only knew then what I know now . . . my life would be so different today.’

That's probably true for you.

And if you don't have a plan, it'll end up being true for your kids too.

See, as you read this, Grade 3 children across Australia are being taught about credit cards by the Commonwealth Bank. Facebook is studying your kids' every like, share and photo, and selling to advertisers who, in turn, sell them to someone else. Google is covertly building up a highly detailed profile of what your kids are searching for, to use later.

These companies have a plan for your kids.

It's time you do too.

You need to fight for their future.

And yet when I say this to parents, they often reply with things like:
