

going to live with us for another four years and then they're out on their own.

When we announced 'The $100 Challenge', the kids were really excited about it.

For the Money Meal, we made homemade pizza and got out our bills—a mobile bill, an electricity bill and a car insurance bill—one for each kid. They're really competitive and made a game out of who could save us the most money.

And—it actually worked!

Offering a monetary incentive really lit a fire under them. We told them we would pay them a 100 per cent commission on anything they could save us—the catch was they had to save half.

Even though we redid our power bill six months ago, our son was still able to get us a better deal! Plus, our daughter scored more data and a cheaper phone plan, so she was happy!

It was the easiest $762.80 we've ever made!

An added bonus was they came out of the challenge with a better understanding of the ebbs and flows of electricity bills. They now get why we let the pool go green in winter—because they've seen the costs involved in running the filter through summer.

Since we did the Money Meal, I've even noticed they're turning the lights off around the house.

Better yet, my son has already asked if he can renegotiate another bill!
