

I've never met a kid who wants to learn 'financial literacy'.

'You know, Mum, what I really want is to be . . . more financially literate,' said no kid, ever.

So you and I are going to do something sneaky: we're going to hide our life-changing lessons in a hairnet.

That's right—once your teen turns 15, they are going to get a part-time job.

This is a BIG deal.

To score a job they'll need to build up their confidence, and sell themselves to a complete stranger in an interview. And then once they start working, they'll learn all about bosses, bank accounts, low-cost super, taxes, and how long you need to deep-fry a nugget so it tastes something like chicken.

Financial literacy, baby!

This chapter checks off the seventh and arguably most important challenge of the Barefoot Ten: 'get a part-time job from age 15 (even for just a few hours a week)'.

And that's also why I've gone deep undercover for your kid . . . like Johnny Depp in 21 Jump Street undercover. (Actually, that's an obscure reference to an eighties TV show. These days Captain Jack is better known as the owner of the two handbag dogs that our deputy prime minister threatened to kill. So let's end this analogy now.)

Yes, over the past few months I've had a part-time job myself—applying for part-time jobs all over the joint.

Seriously, I even created an alter ego, 15-year-old 'Scottina Papina', and tackled the entire employment enchilada, applying for jobs at Coles, Woolies, Macca's, KFC and small local businesses.

Best of all, I've boiled everything I've learned down to a simple, three-step system that will almost guarantee your teen will get hired:

- You'll hear from the top tacos at Australia's biggest youth employers on behind-the-scenes hacks to score a job (like 'front up and talk to the manager at 4 pm on a Tuesday').
