

- Then your teen will fill out my Zero to Hero Résumé template, specifically designed for kids with little to no experience, and which answers the five specific questions that all employers really want applicants to address.
- Finally, they'll use my 'Open Book Interview' strategy to blitz their interview . . . because they'll walk into the interview carrying the perfect answers to all of the questions.

What follows is possibly the most confidence-boosting thing your teen will ever do.

Let's get flippin'.

Cold cuts

I got my first bona fide job the day I turned age 14 and nine months.

Seriously, I was the sort of kid who marked the day on the calendar in the kitchen.

I remember questioning my dad about this bizarre age restriction. Sure, I said, I could totally understand that the Government needed to protect primary school kids from being pimped out by their parents. But what made absolutely no sense to my 14-year-old brain was the tacked-on nine months.

What was supposed to happen to my adolescent brain in those 270 days?

Would I magically wake up nine months after my birthday with the new-found skill of stacking shelves? Or maybe lawmakers were counting back to the month I was conceived?

My father's response to my whining was to pull out his parental 'get out of jail free' card: 'Don't argue with me, mate. I don't make the rules. It's the law!'

And he was (sorta) right.

It turns out that the law states that you do have to be a 'minimum age of 14 and nine months' . . .