

You'll want to let them have a crack at these steps first, before going through it together in the upcoming Money Meal.

Again, I've tested it, and any teen can put this résumé together in a night.

Now this is important: your kid should do one for EACH prospective employer, especially where it's a small business. Small business owners can tell who's handing them a mass-printed résumé and who's taken a few minutes to google their business and personalise the application.

Next, they should print off their résumé and front up to the store in person to deliver it to the manager.

If your teen is applying at Macca's (or any of the other 'majors'), they'll be able to take this info and enter it via the online application process. (They should still do the résumé, though, because it will come in handy in the interview.)

Once they've done these steps, they'll be so far ahead of every other kid it'll be almost embarrassing.

Remember, most employers of teens aren't looking for rocket scientists. So long as your kid doesn't put down 'drug dealing' as their work experience or, when asked if they've been convicted of a crime, write 'Not yet :)', they should be fine.

And if it doesn't work first time, they just have to keep going. But don't be too worried. With this résumé, it won't be long before they can move on to the next step . . .

Step 3: The Open Book Interview

What is the interviewer looking for?

Let's get this straight: it's not to sit through an awkward AF (ask your kids) 15-minute get-to-know-you game.

And it's not to do a deep dive on their experience and qualifications, either. If it were about experience and qualifications, they'd just hire them straight off the application, right?
