

What the interviewer really wants to see is that your kid is a decent person who'll fit in with the team. And they want to work this out as quickly as possible so they can get back to their real work.

Seriously, they're not hiring for the head of the United Nations Nuclear Arms Proliferation Department here:

'Can you be trusted to dunk fries without maiming yourself?'

'Yes, I believe I can.'

'Excellent. You're going to fit in well.'

Thankfully, by this point, your teen has already done all the work. See, once they've filled in their Zero to Hero Résumé, they have stories they can adapt to almost any question:

- When they get asked 'Why do you want to work here?' they'll be able to answer from the research they did into the business, and explain exactly what it was they liked about it.
- When the interviewer says, 'Tell me about a difficult situation you faced and how you handled it,' they'll be able to relate the story about the time they got cut from the netball team and had to work really hard to get back in the side.
- Their list of experiences and work history should be a treasure trove of stories just waiting to be told: the time they earned a blue belt in karate . . . the time they saved their parents $100 on their power bill . . . the time they volunteered in the local food drive.

And the best part: they get to bring the answers into the interview with them!

See, unlike school examiners, a job interviewer is impressed when a kid turns up with notes (their Zero to Hero Résumé). It shows they've done their homework . . . and they're serious about getting this job.

So, tell your teen not to freak out when it comes to the job interview.

As long as they turn up on time, looking presentable, and keep their bloody phone in their pocket . . . they won't instantly fail. Even better, they can