

bring in their Zero to Hero Résumé, to peek at if they get stumped on any question.

In fact, they can even tell the interviewer, ‘I really want this job, so I actually spent a couple of hours preparing some notes for this interview, to convince you that I’d be a great fit.’

Undercover parenting

No doubt, it can be difficult and awkward to get through to teenagers when they’re always staring at a screen, or hiding in their room (or hiding in their room staring at a screen). Plus they have a finely tuned BS radar, and they know you’re really uncool, and possibly not that bright.

Yet think about what you’re doing with them by helping them apply for a job:

You’re sitting down together and identifying your teen’s unique strengths, skills and abilities . . .

You’re finding stories from their past that bring to life the times they used these strengths, skills and abilities . . .

Then, at the crescendo, there’s a challenge that gives your teen external validation of their success—someone outside the family saying, ‘I’m impressed with you, and I want you on my team.’

That’s how powerful applying for a part-time job can be for your teen. But best of all, it gives you a socially acceptable way of building up your teen’s self-esteem without making them want to stick their fingers down their throat.

And let’s be honest: by the time they’re getting a job, you have limited time remaining with them under your roof—so this ‘undercover parenting’ may be one of the last chances you get to make a lasting impression on them.

So now, let’s put it all together in what is possibly the most powerful Money Meal of all.