

Zero to Hero

Most kids are totally freaked out about applying for a job.

They're getting more responsibility . . . they have to come up with answers to questions about experience they don't think they have . . . and they even have to do an interview IRL (in real life)!

So in this Money Meal, you're going to help them succeed.

What you're going to do now is sit down over dinner with your teen, and fill out the Zero to Hero Résumé.

First, you'll get them to identify specific times in their life when they were confident, courageous and hard-working.

Second, you'll get the broader family to share their (positive!) stories about your teen's strengths and abilities. ('What about that time you had the flu and still made it to the exam?')

Then, you'll get your teen to put all these positive stories into their Zero to Hero Résumé.

Make a big deal of it. It's an inflection point for your teen at 15 years of age. And if you can't find the time, well, it's even worth taking the day off work and thinking through this—it could change your kid's life.
