

Your teen should write everything down, and add anything new to their résumé after dinner.

Over the next week, they should use their updated résumé to start applying for jobs.

DESSERT:

Play the Family Legends game:

Do you know . . .

- what Mum's or Dad's first job was?
- what Grandma or Grandpa did for a living?
- what mistakes Mum or Dad made when starting out in their career and what they learned?

Then, do payday (three minutes is all it takes!).

Everyone pitches in and does the dishes.

Look what you've achieved!

By helping your teen with this process, you've done something invaluable for them.

You've shown them how to throw together a killer résumé in just one night (a skill that will be useful to them for years to come).

You've taught them how to impress an interviewer, even if they have no job-specific skills and no prior experience.

And you've given them their start in the world of paid employment—one of the very last steps they'll need to take before they become adults in their own right.

Yet the most powerful thing you've just done is to inject a life-changing dose of confidence.
