

Your teen has officially entered the workforce.

And they'll never be more pumped than the first week or two after they land their first job.

Everything is new and exciting, and then . . . the novelty quickly wears off.

That's why in their first few weeks of employment, you're going to teach them how it really works.

Yes, all that experience you've gained over the years working with morons, slackers and weirdos hasn't been for nothing. You're going to navigate your teen through the unwritten rules of work, and show them how they can check off number eight of the Barefoot Ten, by 'earning at least one glowing reference from a boss'.

The lessons you teach your teen over the next few weeks could add millions of dollars to their net worth over their lifetime, and make them happier than 70 per cent of the working population.

Also in this chapter we'll cover:

- Taxi-cab confessions: the hidden benefit of locking your teens up
- Why 70 per cent of Australians are just phoning it in at work (and how to avoid your teen doing it)
- How your teen can get a glowing reference from their boss (using Barefoot Rule 85).

But first, I'd like to introduce you to the hardest-working girl I know: Barefoot Betty.

Woof, woof!

A tough old girl

Take a look at that dog on the cover.

Her name is Betty, and she's a sheepdog from the Mallee.
