

Tell your teen to look out for these people—and discuss them as you're driving home together.

Then, give your teen one goal: to purposefully develop a reputation for being a hard worker . . . like Betty.

Very soon they'll be known as the kid who gets things done. No whining. No complaining. No excuses.

The payoff for being like Betty is that they'll get pay rises, and promotions, and a glowing reference (which is what this Barefoot Ten experience is all about).

But that's just the start.

Remember, they're only one hour into a 90 000-hour career.

Further, the average person spends more time at work than they do with their family and friends.

The character trait of being a hard worker will fundamentally change the course of your teen's life. It'll quite likely earn them millions of dollars more for the same number of hours that their whining co-workers put in. And they'll enjoy their work.

How to be like Betty

You don't have to hit your teenager with all the philosophical stuff right now, of course. Instead, focus on the feelings: the pride they'll feel and the respect they'll gain by being known as a hard worker.

Also, I've got three 'Betty Behaviours' that will make this easy to achieve:

- Be on time. (Yoda, you set the tone here.)
- Roll up your sleeves and get the job done, even when the boss isn't around.
- Say please and thank you, and smile while you do it.

Sounds simple, right?
