

Well, I've employed 55-year-olds who haven't learned these habits. A little bit of class never goes out of style, and if your teen can nail these three Betty Behaviours they'll go a long, long way.

What's more, they'll never have to worry about being right-sized, downsized, or replaced by a robot. (Case in point: Betty will never be dumped for a drone—she has a better battery life, and she brings home the lamb.)

And finally, how do you check off the next item from the Barefoot Ten, and 'earn at least one glowing reference from a boss'?

If your teen has been following the Betty Behaviours—and they've developed a reputation as a hard worker—then they'll have earned their glowing reference.

Yet that doesn't mean they'll automatically get it.

That's because it's usually just not on the boss's radar (and I say this as a boss who has given dozens of references).

They need to ask for it.

(That's the old Barefoot Rule 85: Don't ask, don't get.)

It can be as simple as knocking on their office door during lunch, or sending a polite email. The important thing is that they don't just sit there and wait for their boss to walk up and hand them a reference letter and a box of chocolates.

Teach your teen that they need to kick butt, and take names.

Time to celebrate!

For this Money Meal, you're going to celebrate the rite of passage of your teen's first job. And if they have younger siblings this is especially strong, because you're building up another family legend: 'In our family, we celebrate getting a job.'
