

Point out to your teen that if they can just do the three Betty Behaviours they'll instantly be ahead of nearly three-quarters of the population, who just phone it in and do the minimum to get by. And it'll pay off for them a hundredfold in satisfaction, job security, income, and (eventually) achieving our Barefoot Ten for this chapter: ‘to earn at least one glowing reference from a boss’.

But above all, remember to have fun—this night is about celebrating their win.

Money Meal ‘shopping list’

- Get your teen to bring along all their work documentation (employment contract, super, payslip etc.) to talk about over dinner.

BAREFOOT MONEY MEAL

THE CELEBRATION!

Either go out to dinner, or bake a cake and put streamers up. You're going out of your way to let your whole family know that this is a celebration—and set a precedent for any younger siblings.

ENTRÉE:

Explain to your teen what they're at work for: the money, perks, friendships, sure. But the main reason is that it is the first step down a long path—and they want a glowing reference from their boss.

But this isn't about brown-nosing. It's about setting them up for a successful, profitable, enjoyable career.

All they need to do is internalise and follow the Betty Behaviours:

1. Be on time.
