

My husband and I both work for ourselves. He's a cray fisherman and I'm a freelance journalist, and we also have a small cattle farm.

That means our son, Jamison, has grown up seeing us work hard —and we've taught him you have to work for things you want and not rely on Lotto wins or inheritances.

He regularly helps us on the farm and we are very fair: if he works as hard as any other contractor we could employ, we pay him just as well. And he always does!

When he was 13, he used his pocket money to buy some bobby calves. Every day, for 12 weeks, he would set his alarm for 5.30 am and bottle-feed the calves before school. Doing that taught him the value of showing up on time: soon he'll be able to sell them for $1000 each—that's his car fund!

When it came time to get a 'real' job, one of the only positions available was a graveyard shift at the local crayfish factory. It was pretty challenging for him—he was the youngest worker there and sometimes shifts started at 1 am on a school night!

Yet he put his head down, worked hard, and was polite to everyone. He ended up winning the respect of his workmates—and even his boss at the crayfish factory says he works like a machine.

Not only has he learned the joy of hard work, but it's clear following the 'Betty Behaviours' is going to take him far in his career. In fact, his boss
