

Young talent time

As a parent reading this, you've been great and all . . .

. . . but for this chapter, I'm going to write to your teen.

I've helped out my 15-year-old nephews; now I'm going to help yours.

Here's the thing:

if you've been playing along at home and checking off some of the Barefoot Ten, your teen will easily have built up the confidence to totally smash this chapter, and 'open up an ultra-low-cost, high-growth super fund'.

However, I know that every teen is different. Maybe there's no way they'd be caught dead reading a book their lame-o parents recommended. And if that's the case, feel free to just read this yourself—and talk to them about it. I give you permission to steal my best lines.

Otherwise, please pass the phone (well, book). Your teen and I are about to have a very important discussion.

Prove them wrong: Why you will become a millionaire

Hey,

My name is Scott Pape, and I am the Barefoot Investor.

My one (and only) claim to fame is that I am very, very good at helping people with their money.

And today I'm going to help you.

There will be no spreadsheets, no calculators, and no plastic piggy banks.
