

I don't know about you, but the final financial yardstick that I have for my kids is them buying their first home (nothing flashy . . . just a decent starter home that they can begin building up their equity in).

Then I'll be like George 'Dubya' Bush standing on an aircraft carrier under a giant 'Mission Accomplished' banner.

(Okay, so maybe that's not the best image . . .)

My thinking is that if my kids can buy their own home they'll be living the lessons of this book:

They'll have figured out how to work bloody hard, like Barefoot Betty.

And, this being the era of Taylor Swift, they'll have learned to Shake It Off and systematically save for years.

Holy guacamole, Barefoot! Is it even realistic in this day and age for kids to try to crack the housing market?

Yes it is—and I'm going to show you how your kids can do it . . . with a special approach I call the Barefoot Ladder.

I'm also going to show you:
