

Well, the real question is: how can you teach your kids to fend for themselves?

And I have just the answer for you.

Introducing the Barefoot Ladder

Most kids approach buying a house the same way as getting down a ball that's stuck on a roof.

They look up, and realise it's too high to grab.

After a few half-hearted jumps, they stomp their feet and resign themselves to the fact that it's 'impossible' to ever get it back.

(Then they go inside and eat a smashed avocado sandwich.)

As the parent, what you're going to do is put up a ladder, and you'll hold it for them, as they climb.

But you're not going to do the climbing for them. And you're not going to push them up with your head up their backside.

'HEAVE!'

No, it's your kid's choice as to whether they want to climb the ladder.

Okay, so it's a simple metaphor, but an incredibly powerful one.

The Barefoot Ladder will light a fire in the belly for your kids, and get them into their first home.

It'll incentivise them to work hard, and save even harder.

And best of all, it won't blow a hole in your own financial plan.

Let me explain how it works:

Your teen (if you have one) is going to open a savings account for their home deposit. And they're going to begin saving into it, starting now. No ifs. No buts. Even if it's just a few bucks.
