

At the same time, you're going to set up your own 'Barefoot Ladder Fund' where you can start socking money away today so that you can help your teen as they climb up the property ladder. (If you don't have a teen yet, even better—the earlier you start this, the better it works.)

Yet it won't be a handout.

Because here's what's special about this money you'll save: it's your money, not theirs.

You control it. You invest it long term for maximum growth (I'll show you how). You decide how much you give them, and when.

And when you pay out, you do not give them a handout—instead you're going to match their savings efforts (more on this in a moment). So you're still helping them . . . yet they're working for every cent you give them.

This is the Barefoot Ladder in a nutshell.

Now let's talk about how to make it happen.

Your teen's home deposit savings account

Back in Chapter 1, your teen got their own Serviette Strategy.

Now I want you to add to the serviette by having them open up another linked high-interest savings account, and nickname it 'Tom's Home Deposit'.
