

The fact is, eventually they're going to want to own a home . . . and this is the account they'll use to save for it.

They may only put in a few bucks a year, but it doesn't matter—you've planted the seed.

And that seed will grow, believe me. Every time they open their banking app, they'll see their Home Deposit Savings account . . . and think of the goal they're saving for.

Drip, drip, drip.

Too many whining millennials cry into their $12 seeded kale smoothies and moan that the expense of buying a home is unfair (which it is!). Yet crying never got anyone anywhere. By opening an account, and starting to save, your kid is already climbing the property ladder—even if they can't see it yet.

Your Barefoot Ladder Fund

While your teen climbs towards their first property, you need to be right behind them, holding the ladder.

Let them know that for every dollar they save in their home deposit account you'll chip in some money.

How much?

Well, if you can afford it, you could match them dollar for dollar.

However, I fully understand that most parents won't be able to do that. Yet even if you can only match them, say, ten cents per dollar . . . wouldn't it be great if you could say to your kids: 'I'm going to give you some motivation to get you into your first home. For every dollar you save in your home deposit account, I'm going to award you a 10 per cent bonus. How's that for a rocking interest rate?'

Whatever you decide is the right level of matching, I'm going to show you how to start planning for it today, so that you can make it a reality tomorrow.