

The Victory Dinner

You should be as proud as punch at what you have achieved for your kids.

And so it's only right that our final Barefoot meal is a Victory Dinner that celebrates your financially fit family.

Here's how you probably picture it going down:

You walk into the dining room one evening, and instantly notice something is different.

The good plates are on the table . . . and there are . . . serviettes? Why are there serviettes on the table?

Your entire family is seated, decked out in their Sunday best.

You look over and see that your son has his head buried in his phone (hey, some things don't change).

And then he hits play on his phone.

'We Are the Champions' by Queen starts blaring.

Then your son gets up, and with tears running down his cheeks he gives you a great big bear hug.

You sit down, overwhelmed with emotion, and your kids raise a toast: 'To the best parents in the world!'

Okay . . . so that is NOT going to happen.

With parenting, there isn't a lot of positive reinforcement.

Not a lot of pats.

But there is a lot of door-slamming.

A lot of 'I hate you!' . . . 'How dare you?!' . . . 'You are so embarrassing.'

Bottom line: there's more 'you ruined my life' than 'you changed my life'.
