

This fear rattled around in my brain for years, until I had this realisation:

I can't control when I die, but the one thing I can control is having everything sorted and prepared for my family.

Imagine this

Stop for a minute.

Read the next few lines slowly and play along with me:

I want you to think about your family.

It's two weeks after your funeral. Everyone has moved on . . . except them.

Everything's a mess.

They have no idea if you had a will.

They have no idea what you wanted for your funeral.

Each day brings another frustrating conversation with another frustrating bureaucrat who gives them a frustratingly long list of things they have to do to administer your financial affairs.

None of it makes any sense!

They slump into a cold, lonely bed at night, exhausted and overwhelmed.

They grab their phones and flick on Facebook . . . and your face beams back at them. They can't work out how to shut down your profile and delete all the random posts and chatter from weirdos who barely even knew you. It's just another painful reminder of the never-ending list of things they have to get sorted.

They're at the lowest point in their life . . . and their grief is being compounded because they have to deal with all this . . . crap.

Now, listen up: I've seen this happen in real life, over and over again.

I've helped too many distraught, overwhelmed widows, and widowers, fumble through the financial fog.

This situation is actually normal.
