

There's the password for your Facebook and social media accounts, so they can be memorialised straight away.

Your partner turns the next page, and stops. She can't believe it. You've actually taken the time to write down specific answers to the questions that are now swirling around in her head: whether you want your organs donated, any specific funeral instructions, and more.

And then she turns to the final page and reads your final message . . . and bursts into tears.

This is the power of the Fearless Folder. And this is what we're going to do right now . . . in three simple steps:

Step 1: Collect your important documents.

Step 2: Invest in a fireproof, waterproof safe.

Step 3: Write your last letter.

Let's do this.

Step 1: Collect your important documents

'Collect your important documents' sounds like something your mother would say, right?

Relax . . . I've created an idiot-simple checklist, and you'll be able to get most of this done in one night.

Rather than manually printing out all your statements, there's a simpler way: from this day forth, change all your bills to be delivered via email. This way, you just need to leave your executor (and your loved ones) access to your email address—and they'll have all your latest bills.
