

Instead of Barefoot Date Nights, we're going to have a weekly 'Barefoot Money Meal'.

And given we're already in the business of feeding our kids each night, this is going to be simple.

All you have to do is have dinner, once a week, and I'll take care of the rest. Sound good? Good.

Now, take a deep breath and kick off your shoes—we're about to take our First Steps.

'I swore I'd make things different for my daughter . . .'

Amanda Screen, Ballina, NSW

I remember the exact moment I told my husband that our daughter had a brain tumour.

He was looking after our four-month-old son. He just went into shock and couldn't speak. To be told your child is going to die is the worst thing imaginable.

The doctors said she had 12 months to live. She was only six at the time. I thought that moment was the lowest point in my life . . . but that was to come.
