

The Final Goodbye

We're approaching our final goodbye.

In fact, now that you've completed your Fearless Folder, you've technically 'finished' this book.

There's a good reason I've asked you to do the Fearless Folder right now, just before we part ways.

Yes, it's going to keep your family safe. But it's also a very powerful way to put you in the right 'space' to think about your life, and what really matters.

See, most of the time, your mind is elsewhere. If you're anything like me, you have things going on all the time. You're rushing, or hungry, or stressed, or annoyed, or tired . . . but rarely reflective.

Yet the great thing about doing something as old-school as reading this book is that you've been able to take a little time out of your usually crazy life . . . and you and I have been able to chat for a few hours.

Look, you know as well as I do how it's going to go from here.

Your phone will soon be buzzing in your pocket. There'll be another basketball pickup to do. Another work email will come through. There's a dishwasher that needs to be unpacked . . .

'RIGHT NOW!'

So what I want you to do, in the brief moments we have left, is step back with me to the start.

Remember that on the first page of this book, I asked you to picture the day your kid leaves home.

Well, I'd like you to picture that scene again. Only this time, you've got the confidence of having done everything you've just read in these pages—and so has your kid. So that picture's going to look a little different . . .
