

Believe it or not, paying pocket money is one of the most powerful tools you have to teach your kids about money.

Yet for most parents, it's a source of shame . . . because last time they tried it 'it didn't really work with our kids', and their efforts just fizzled out.

Even then, most parents who pay their kids pocket money are only doing it half right.

Getting them to do a few chores and paying them a few bucks is only the first step. The main money lesson comes in what they do with their pocket money: the spending . . . the saving . . . and the giving.

That's where the life-changing lessons really happen. You want to take that pocket money and use it to teach your kids things like goal-setting, delayed gratification, kindness and empathy.

That's why we're going to sort it out first, in Part I: First Steps—and then the rest of this book (and the Barefoot Ten) will build upon those foundations.

Thankfully, I've made it unbelievably easy for you. Because what I'm about to lay out for you is the simplest (yet most powerful) pocket money plan you've ever seen:

Three jars.

Three jobs.

Done and dusted in three minutes a week.

Honestly, if this plan is all you take away from this book, your kids will be so far ahead of everyone else it's scary.

Let's begin.
