

Three Jam Jars

Roughly once a week, a marketing guru contacts me with their ideas on how I can make a lot of cashola.

Their pitch is almost always the same:

I should ‘capitalise on the success of the Barefoot Investor book by diversifying the product offering’.

And their solution is almost always the same:

I should create an app that I can charge people $2.50 a month for.

Or sell Barefoot-branded piggy banks.

Or do a deal with a bank on a Barefoot-approved account.

And my answer is always the same:

No. No. And are you freaking kidding me? No!

I much prefer a no-technology method that I call ‘three jam jars’.

So, please put this book down right now, head to the pantry, and get some Tim Tams. While you’re there, check and see if you have three jam jars.

(Actually, any three glass jars will do. We had the same big-arse jar of pickled onions in our pantry for my entire childhood. I guess Mum bought them thinking she’d try that fancy Peter Russell-Clarke recipe, but never got around to it.)

Also check and see if you have stickers to get your kids to label their jars—the more sparkly the better. If you don’t, make a note to buy some jam and stickers next time you’re doing the shopping.

Go on, do it.

Done? Good.
