

It caught on so well that some in the media even referred to it as ‘the biggest finance cult in Australia’.

Why thousands of Australians have the same bank card, labelled “Splurge”.

Right now, thousands of Australians are flashing orange bankcards with mantras penned with sharpies and stickers. “Splurge”, they read. “Daily expenses” read others. And they all signal one thing: that you are following the biggest financial cult in Australia.

Well, for this book, jam jars are the new buckets for kids.

It’s standard practice to use three containers to teach kids: there are fancy options like Moonjar Australia’s three-part Save, Spend and Share money box and US-based financial guru Dave Ramsey’s Smart Saver Bank, which does the same thing.

In fact, in my last book, I even recommended the concept of jam jars for little kids. However, I’m now convinced that kids all the way up to 15 or so should have them (with a few age-appropriate variations which I’ll explain in good time).

After all, the point is they will transition from the jars to bank accounts when they’re older.

And there’s power in kids being able to see they’re using the same kinds of accounts their parents have.

So let me introduce you to the three jam jars your kids (under the age of 15) will be using . . .
