

The Splurge Jar

Okay, it's time to walk off those Tim Tams.

Get up! Stretch!

Put a sticker on one of the jars, grab a texta, and write 'Splurge'.

This jar is for your kids' day-to-day spending.

Hang on, am I saying that I want your kids to splurge part of their money?

Yes, that's exactly what I'm saying.

The truth is that sometimes pocket money works a little too well: kids can get so addicted to watching the coins pile up in their jars that they don't want to spend it:

'Little Mickey is such a good little saver; he won't spend his money on anything!' brag his proud parents.

Twenty years later . . .

'Michael is such a miserable tightarse! He won't spend money on anything or anyone. No wonder he can't get a girlfriend,' snivels his frustrated friend.

You don't want your kids to grow up with an unhealthy obsession with money. Neither do you want your kids to grow up like one of those twatty teenagers on Instagram who posts a selfie with their $900 handbag (#myparentsfailed).

This jar will help turn your kids into well-adjusted, savvy spenders.

There's just one caveat with this jar for older kids:

No self-respecting 12-year-old is going to the mall with a jam jar tucked under their arm.

'Hey Todd! Check out my jam jar, man.' Not going to happen.

So, in addition to their jam jars, I'd suggest you get them a wallet or purse that they can transfer their Splurge money to.
