

Picture this:

Your kid came home on Monday with a stomach bug and gave gastro to the entire family, which lasted a full week.

Your kids are sick, and bratty, and smelly. Your partner is like a bear with a sore bottom (they've got the runs too).

How are those 91 chores going?

Look, you want your kids to work and earn money, absolutely. But you don't want to set the bar so high that they have to complete 91 things in a week to get a passing grade.

It's more likely you'll grind it out for a few weeks and then wave the white flag, or your kids will wear you down (or both), and you'll never do it again.

So what's the solution?

Keep it simple—real simple

I'm a money man, and I can tell you there is absolutely NO WAY my family would last a week on a 91-chores plan. I wouldn't even attempt it: I'd be setting up myself—and my kids—to fail.

So I have a ridiculously simple strategy for handling my kids' chores.

To be honest, though, I hate the word 'chores', because it makes them sound like, well, chores. So in this book I'm going to call them 'jobs', which is exactly how it works for adults—you get paid for the jobs you do.

And here's the best part . . .

Your entire strategy is boiled down to one simple line:

Kids have three jobs to do each week—and they only get paid if they do them.

It's up to you what jobs you want your kids to do, and the payment for each.
