

When your kid turns 15, they'll often scream at you: 'You treat me like a child!'

(Maybe you do, maybe you don't. I'm staying out of it.)

And they are technically correct—they are on the cusp of adulthood. So they deserve a promotion . . . to their very own part-time job.

Let them know that they've now reached an age where they can legally work. Explain that you'll continue paying them pocket money for household jobs while they apply for their first real job.

But if they're not willing to apply for part-time jobs, you'll cut off their pocket money.

And once they get a part-time job, they won't need the pocket money (and you won't be giving it to them anyway). After all, they can earn far more in just a few hours of work than they ever got in pocket money.

Hang on, how will they get a job?

Tell them they're going to be the mascot for the local footy team (the Bendigo Badger!).

Actually, that's a joke. Later on, in Chapters 7 and 8 (Part II), I'm going to give you the inside running on how your teen can land a part-time job—even with zero experience. I've spoken to some heavy hitters and got it all sorted for your teen.

No badgering required

Now, understand the secret sauce of this simple three-job plan:

Ideally, you want your kids to be able to do these three jobs quickly on a Sunday afternoon (even with gastro) and still earn their pocket money.

Yet of course, you're the parent, so you know your kids better than anyone (well, apart from Mark Zuckerberg). So you should definitely take my suggestions as just that—suggestions. And soon you're going to get the opportunity to tailor these jobs to your kids, your family and your situation.
