

Three Minutes

I promised that the cornerstone of this book would be a plan so easy you could do it in under three minutes a week.

Well, here it is: a simple ritual that's lazy parenting at its best.

You want easy?

Start the clock:

First minute (and I'm being generous here): Check your kid has done their three weekly jobs.

If they haven't, yell 'Do you want to get paid? Do your jobs!'

No need to get up . . . holler from the kitchen.

Second minute: Pay them. Count out the coins like a croupier, straight into their hand.

Third minute: Watch them divvy it up into the three jars. (The only rule? Every jar must get something.)

And that's it!

Seriously, pat yourself on the back: in just three minutes you've reinforced the link between 'working' and 'earning' in your kid's mind.

Hold your Bacardi, how do you know your kid isn't pulling a Clive Palmer on you, and pretending they've done their jobs?

I'm glad you ask. Enter the Barefoot Scoreboard.