

Money is fast becoming invisible (my kids think I'm a wizard with a magic leather pouch that allows me to take stuff from shops with only a wave).

So as you lay the financial foundations for your children, you need to create a visual link between hard work and money. You need to turn down the tech.

This is where the Barefoot Scoreboard comes in. You can download it from the Barefoot Investor website (barefootinvestor.com/resources).

(Note: if you can't be arsed photocopying this or printing it out simply write your own.)

Stick it on the fridge and tell your kids: to get paid, your jobs must be done—and crossed off on the Scoreboard.

As you can see, it covers a month, so you'll need to print out a new one every four to five weeks. Or, simply laminate it and use a whiteboard marker to save on the printing.

Here's the point: it's important that your kids mark off their jobs themselves.

Why?

You want to give them the feeling of satisfaction that comes from achieving a win.

It's the kid equivalent of clearing your email inbox.

So give them that win!

Everything you wanted to know about jobs (and pocket money) in one page

How much should I pay?

A good rule of thumb is to pay $1 per week, per year of age. So a seven-year-old would get $7 a week. Or you can halve it to 50 cents per week,