

per year of age. Heck, you can even do a tenth of it for all I care.

It's simply a visual aid for teaching values. And they get a pay rise each birthday! (But it's your job to make them earn it—they should take on more responsibility in their jobs.)

Oh, and it shouldn't need to be said, but it does need to be said: pay your daughters the same as your sons.

A 2018 survey of more than 10 000 schoolchildren by the University of Melbourne found that not only are girls doing more housework than boys but they're getting less pocket money than boys.

And we wonder why women still get paid less for doing the same job, and typically retire with less than half the super savings of men?!

No excuses.

Should pocket money always be linked to jobs?

Abso-freakin-lutely. The only way to truly teach your kids the value of a buck is to make them work for it. You want to show them the joy of hard work. Now, if they miss a few jobs because they're sick, that's fine—just make a part payment for the week. (And let them catch up next week.)

Parents, repeat after me: 'If you don't work, you don't get paid.'

Hang on, shouldn't kids help out around the house for free?

Hell yeah they should help out. And that's the next big topic we're going to look at.

But first, I want you to do something important . . .
