

The Barefoot Money Meal

Some families have healthy traditions . . . like all barracking for the same footy team.

The Pape family tradition happens every Christmas lunch when my father threatens to slip coins into the pudding for the kids to ‘discover’ as they’re eating.

Now, depending on how much Christmas cheer he’s had, the results could range from diarrhoea to death:

Honestly, do you know how much bacteria there is on the average coin?

Does Dad even wash them before slipping them into the pudding (with a bit of pocket fluff)?

It’s always a tense time for Liz . . . ‘What if one of the children swallows a 20-cent piece? They’ll choke!’

Bah! Merry Christmas from the Papes!

Well, today we’re going to create a family tradition that you’ll never regret: the Barefoot Money Meal (it’s like a Date Night, but for families).

This little meal will do more for your kids’ financial future than a fancy $35 000-a-year private school, and it’ll provide you with some of your most precious family memories years from now.

Drip, drip, drip

If there’s a smell that defines my childhood, it’s rissoles cooking in a frying pan.

I can still hear the sizzling and spitting.
