

Throughout this book, as we go through the Barefoot Ten (in Part II), I'll be taking you through some extra-special Money Meals I've designed for each step—which are carefully engineered to imprint a specific lesson about money on your kids' minds.

Yet the real power in Barefoot Money Meals is not just doing ten of them here and there . . . but in doing them week in, week out, and regularly sharing a meal where the whole family pitches in and gets paid for the week's work.

Here's a pro tip: to build the habit, choose the same night each week. In our family, it's Sunday, but whatever works for you.

The Family Legends game

Every family has their own legends.

Dad was once a gun footy player. Mum was once a world-famous yodeller, tragically cut short in her prime. Grandpa invested his life savings in Apple in the eighties, but sold them out to buy . . . oranges?

A 2001 study by American psychologists Marshall Duke and Robyn Fivush found that asking kids simple 'Do You Know?' questions about their family history gives them control over their lives—by giving them a powerful sense they are part of something bigger than themselves.

In other words, it gives them their family backstory.

Questions like:

- Do you know what went on when you were being born?
- Do you know where your mother/father grew up?
- Do you know some of the jobs your parents had when they were young?

Almost every Barefoot Money Meal in this book has some questions like this for your kids.

I call it the Family Legends game.
