

There's method to the madness: you're going to create your own Family Legends—the good times, the hard times, and, most importantly of all, how you bounced back when things went bad. What's more, the families that have gone through this book tell me that Family Legends is one of the most powerful and enjoyable parts of the Barefoot Money Meals.

And before we get to your first Money Meal, I've got one last little tip for you—and we have Steve Jobs to thank for it.

Put down your bloody phone

Steve Jobs was one of the greatest entrepreneurs who ever lived.

We all remember Steve the Visionary—standing on stage, unveiling yet another shiny gadget that would cause geeks to camp out on the street to be the very first person to shell out $800.

Yet what you may not know is that Steve the Dad was a very different dude.

For example, when a journalist from the New York Times asked Jobs how his kids liked the iPad, he replied:

'They haven't used it. We limit how much technology our kids use at home.'

Right-y-o.

That's a bit like finding out that Willy Wonka didn't let the Oompa Loompas eat chocolate!

Meanwhile, in most Aussie homes, we're glued to our screens. A 2015 study (by Telstra) showed 40 per cent of adults admit to taking their phones to the loo. Seriously, how good is Steve Jobs' marketing machine?

Yet not only did Steve put down his phone around his kids—he also employed what we now agree is the 'killer app' of parenting.

In his biography of Steve Jobs, author Walter Isaacson observed dinner times at the Jobs household:
