

I honestly didn't expect Money Meals would work for our kids.

Nobody ever taught me about money, so I was worried about how I would be able to teach our kids. And with four kids, including one on the autism spectrum, it can be hard to get everyone together for a meal.

In the past, we've tried to do chores but it was hard to get all the kids on board, or to get them to stick to it. We had too many jobs to cover for the week and I would end up having to do it all myself and not pay the kids. In the end, I was so frustrated, I just gave up.

But with this plan they have been proactive and self-motivated. And better yet, no more nagging!

'Three jars, three jobs, three minutes' has been a game changer. I love how simple it is and that the kids have control over it. They choose what their dinner duty is, what jobs they will do, and what they're saving up for.

At first, our youngest was resistant to the idea of having to work for money at all—but when I explained the scoreboard and the jars, he understood he would have control over his own money. He is now self-motivated to do his jobs and very focused on his savings goal: spending money for a school excursion to Canberra.

Our eldest child has Asperger's. He doesn't like talking about money and was initially reluctant to do Money Meals because he was worried it would change his routine. But we have already noticed he is doing his dinner duties without being asked, which is amazing.
