

This is another high-interest online savings account, linked to their everyday Splurge account. The aim of this account is to get them excited about saving . . . by harnessing their hormones.

What is it that makes teens smile?

Freedom.

Most teenagers want a car when they turn 18. Other teens want to travel overseas.

Well, in all cases the formula is this:

Flipping Burgers $\times$ Time = Freedom

Once your kid gets a part-time job, you're going to sit down with them and plan out how much they need to save each week to achieve something cool.

By setting up an automatic direct debit and diverting $20 a week into their Smile account, they could have more than $4000 by the time they finish school.

That's a trip to New York City.

Okay, the two teen accounts so far—Splurge and Smile—have the same names as the jam jars, which makes it an easy transition for kids when the time comes. For the third account we're going to do something a bit more grown-up.

The Mojo account

This is a high-interest online savings account preferably opened with another bank, so they don't see it in their regular day-to-day banking app.

Regular Barefooters will know that a Mojo account is your financial 'get out of jail free' card—when you have savings set aside, you're never financially vulnerable. You call the shots.

Honestly, I could fill a phone book with the emails and letters from people who've been saved by setting up their Mojo account, first with $2000 and
