

I guarantee that if they do this, they're going to have a totally different view on savings, and credit, and life.

Okay, so those are your teen's three accounts. In the upcoming Money Meal, I'm going to get you to sketch out this plan with your teen. Trust me, it'll be worth it! It'll set them up with awesome money habits right from the get go.

For now don't get stressed about the details. I'm just giving you an overview of the basic account structure and how it all fits together. Now let's talk actual bank accounts.

The best bank accounts for your teen

Australia may be the lucky country, but our luck runs out when it comes to banking: according to the Australia Institute, we pay some of the highest bank fees in the world. That explains why four banks trouser a combined $30 billion in profits each year.

Here are my 'non-negotiables' when it comes to choosing a bank account:

- Zero fees. No account-keeping fee, no ATM fees (not even the dodgy ones at convenience stores).
- easy access to your funds.
- a market-leading interest rate on savings.

Right now, the best account for your teens is the ING Orange Everyday Youth account.

You have to be at least 15 years old to apply.

Here's you: Hang on, don't you have to deposit $1000 a month and make five transactions with this account?

Here's me: That only applies to adult customers. Those conditions are waived for kids under the age of 18.

And the ING Orange Everyday Youth account comes with a 'risk shield', which prevents the card from being used to purchase alcohol or gambling or
