

pornography.

(Actually, that sounds like something my wife would love to put on my card. Imagine me at the bottle-o: ‘I’m sorry, sir, but your card has been declined. It says, “Check with your wife.”’)

Another thing I like about the ING Orange Everyday Youth is that the linked saver accounts pay cracking interest rates. (Well, as cracking as can be expected in this time of historically ultra-low interest rates.)

The linked ING Savings Maximiser is paying one of the highest interest rates of all online savers (at the time of writing). Your teen can set up two of these—and nickname them Smile and Mojo—at the same time as they’re applying for their Orange Everyday (Splurge) account.

(You could also look at the CUA Everyday Youth Account, with a linked Youth eSaver Account, which—at the time of writing—offers a higher interest rate for kids, but limits you to one Youth eSaver per child.)

Those last few paragraphs make me feel a little queasy, like I’m a cheerleader for ING. I am most certainly not. My only allegiance is to you, my reader. ING has a tacky credit card they’ve just launched, and if I find out they’re marketing it to kids who sign up to their first account, they’ll feel a dose of my Dollarmite wrath!

And one more thing: what if your kid already has a bank account?

Great!

Get them to compare it to the ING account (or any other account that’s on the market) and see if they can get a better deal. Again, this isn’t about the bank; it’s about boosting your kid’s confidence—knowing they’ve scored a good deal.

And when their Splurge transaction card comes in the mail, make a big deal of it. Get them to pull it out at the next Barefoot Money Meal and show you. Discuss the features—even get them to create a little presentation on the card. Really, this should be a proud moment for your teen.

Even better, if you have younger kids, they can now look up to their older sibling as a financial ‘guru’.