Everything you wanted to know about kids' bank accounts in one and a bit pages

Should I pay my teen's pocket money into their new bank accounts?

No—your house rule should be that all pocket money you pay goes into jam jars. The bank accounts are for your teens to divvy up their pay from their own part-time job—and remember, once they have a job, you stop paying them pocket money.

What if my teenager already has a different bank account?

It's totally up to you—and them—whether or not they switch. However, once your teen turns 15, I'd encourage them to open their own bank account. And if they're getting their own account, why not get the best one?

If you opened a high-interest saver in your name when they were little ('Davin's Savings Account'), you may want to transfer the money into their bank account once they've set their own up.

(Note: if as parents you've been saving up money yourself for your child's future, do not transfer that money to their new accounts. I'll have a lot more to say on this in Chapter 10.)

What about those kids' savings accounts paying bonus interest?

Well, let's take a look at one of them.
