

So you decide to invest for yourself. But first, are you the type who can? Temperamentally? Some people can't, you know:

MUFFIN THE MODEL

For example, I helped a young model friend with her investments several years ago. Her name was Muffin Richardson when she lived in Iowa, but on her arrival in New York it became Flicka Stark.

Her hands often appeared in television commercials, daintily shaving a slim leg with a fancy little electric razor, or spilling ink on a pillow treated with something miraculous.

*So you decide to invest for yourself. But first, are you the type who can? Temperamentally?
Some people can't, you know . . .*

Sometimes, only her feet did commercials, and they too were popular and highly paid. When she appeared in total, slim and laughing, perhaps smoking a cigarette on her way to a picnic, or ecstatically waving a hair spray over her shining blond tresses, she received $3000 or $4000 at the time the commercial was released, and half of that sum for its second appearance, and half of that amount for the third appearance (residuals), etc., etc. The girl was coining money, and was smart enough to realize that her luck and her feet weren't going to last forever, and sensible enough to invest most of it as fast as the checks appeared in her mailbox.

Muffin didn't know any more about stocks than the Flopsy Bunnies, but at my suggestion she obediently purchased 100 shares of each of the following: