

This I hardly think is fair. Young Joe doesn't know so many long words. But he claims that he is saying something that has some meaning and he claims it just as definitely as Mr. Bigshot. The latter, having been to business college and also having taken courses in English literature, can make his statement sound sillier. But, since neither of them has any factual or intellectual basis for saying either of these things, I claim the honors are even.

Now it should be said right here that neither of these men is a liar or even a faker.

If you ask Joe why there will be a little rally after lunch, he will tell you in no uncertain terms. He will say that he observes that the volume is decreasing on the down side, that he can see that steels are strongly pegged just above the last previous lows, and that "they" (whoever "they" are) are beginning to accumulate the second-grade carriers. "But it won't go very far," he may add (proving that at heart he is no wild-eyed optimist—more the old-line banker type): "they wouldn't want to see this market run away."

It is a marvelous thing, the way this lingo is universally used in board rooms, not just in New York but from coast to coast. It is as though someone had invented an Esperanto for saying absolutely nothing in a variety of ways.

DREAM STREET

And, if you ask the other chap, the educated one, on what he predicates his fifteen-year opinion, he will give you so many reasons that you will wish you had not asked. But he ought to know better. If he should ever lift his nose out of the minutiae of his fascinating business and view it and its history whole, he would be forced to admit the sad truth that pitifully few financial "experts" have ever known for three years (much less fifteen) what was going to happen to any class of
