

yesterday. You are still $50,000 richer than you were 6 months ago. But it is not human to figure things that way.

You have lost $50,000? Hang on to everything! And you do, and others—hundreds of thousands of others—do likewise. Purchasing is curtailed—ever so slightly perhaps; money becomes a bit tighter—and business is immediately bad in a million minds and on a million tongues!

But is it? Is the stock market the barometer thereof? Has the liquidation of stocks for which there was no inherent reason for their rise undermined the whole business structure?

The stock-market operator—the speculator—is a dealer in realities. . . . He interprets the news into movement, up or down.

It has to some degree—but why? Because men are now taking counsel of their fears rather than their hopes! Their minds are so intent upon the activity of the moment that they fail to take calm counsel of the past with its reasons, or of the future with its possibilities.

That is, most men do not. A few scan the horizon on all sides. A few get to the bottom of things. A few gird their loins and take a suggestive poke at their courage. A few go on! They see what the fall offers, or the early winter, or the spring. And they have so planned their financial pattern that they are able to get ready for another fill-up period—and they go on.

I do not blame less-informed men for pulling in their horns when the bubble bursts. But those who know the broad international currents that influence the ebb and flow of stocks, who appreciate the importance of peace, of good crops, of a demand for labor, of sound currency in the world's markets, need not follow surface trends too closely.
