

frost or a drought, breaks the continuity of thought and arrests the progress of the moment.

Then is the time for looking backward, around and ahead. Then is the time for taking counsel of the concentrated, critical judgment of those men who do things. The answer may be found in the stock market, which is a reflection of their thinking, but again it may not. It all depends on what has gone before or what those keenvisioned speculators who do not deal in dreams see for the future.

The stock market is none the less a barometer of business, but it must be read in causes rather than effects. Those who use it as a guide to business movements should look beyond the mere mathematics or rise and fall to the great national or international forces that are primarily responsible therefor.
