

In short, an “I feel good,” “I feel bright,” or “I love you” sentiment in art, movies, fashion and music parallels a bull market in stocks. At the extreme, an amorphous euphoric “I feel great and I love everybody” sentiment (such as prevailed in the latter half of the 'Sixties) represents a major top in mood, and coincides with a major top in stocks. Conversely, an “I’m depressed,” “I feel dark and dull,” or “I’ll kill you” sentiment in art, movies, fashion and music reflects a bear market. And an amorphous tortured “I’m in agony and I hate everybody” sentiment (apparent in the late 'Seventies) indicated a nadir in mood, and coincides with a major bottom in stocks.

In the early 'Eighties, the negative mood manifestations reached extremes that signaled a major bottom, while positive mood manifestations, one by one, began to emerge. The first evidence of the emerging dominance of positive mood forces was the public's stress on physical self-improvement. In 1980, video spread the drive to shape up. Guess what was popular in that very analogous year, 1920—workout audio. This same psychology was reflected in the huge popularity of the film, Rocky, which expressed the new mood that “you can succeed if you push yourself to the limit.”

The 1982–1983 bull market was accompanied by a nostalgia craze. In fashion, the 'Fifties styles in just about everything reappeared, as did tastes for etiquette, the Boy Scouts, baseball, Disney movies, Ray-Ban sunglasses, macho men, westerns, marriage and babies. In music, the love song once more proved an acceptable, if not dominant, theme for pop hits. Several “supergroups” from the negative mood period, such as The Who and Pink Floyd, played their last concerts and disbanded, while the slow-balled singers vanished from the charts. The heavy metal and punk bands began exhausting themselves under the pressure of the new trend, just as the “fun” bands in 1966 and the “art” bands did in 1969.

After the first major stock market advance peaked in 1983, the 'Fifties craze in music began to wane. The 'Fifties
