

In popular art, The Wall Street Journal noted last Tuesday that a sculpture entitled "Tilted Arc," created by an artist whom the Journal describes as specializing in "huge, malevolent, steel outdoor structures," may be removed from downtown Manhattan "in response to popular disgust." At the same time, the city fathers of St. Louis are considering a referendum on removal of a similar sculpture from their downtown area. That sort of thing rarely happens unless a positive mood trend is in force.

As with music, movies and art, trends in fashion have changed. Yet, it is still too early to characterize the fashion trends as typical of a major top. Fashion designers keep trying to re-introduce miniskirts, but as yet, the public hasn't rushed to buy them. Two-piece bathing suits are making a comeback, but skimpy bikinis are still worn only by a minority at the beaches. "Daring colors" are being introduced by some fashion designers, while reactionaries are trying to re-introduce the maxi-skirt.

The bright colors and shorter hemlines should win out. And until extreme styles are featured on the covers of Time and Newsweek, and are seen everywhere at the shopping malls, the bull market will have a ways to go.
