

his energies and direct his thinking toward the big job of saving the security business as a whole, and saving ourselves in the process.

We've got a job to do — we in the security business — a job of reestablishing faith in the security market as a place for sound investment.

LET'S ELIMINATE UNNECESSARY FRILLS

As we see it, our firm has two important things to do:

One is to get our location expenses under control. Let's get rid of any and all frills which do not make a direct contribution to the fundamental requirements of our customers. For instance, 85% of our customers do most of their business with us over the telephone. They do not need or want elaborate offices. They want simplicity, competent man power, and good, impartial service.

Which brings us to our second objective. We have developed what we consider a sound program of policies, to be put into effect when this merger becomes a reality at the end of this week.

OUR SUCCESS DEPENDS ON SERVICE TO PUBLIC

These policies rest on a conviction — not always uppermost in our minds, we'll grant you — that in order to win success we business men have to put the public's interest first. The customer may not always be right, but he has rights, and upon our recognition of his rights and our desire to satisfy them, rests our chance to succeed.
