

Mount Kilimanjaro and raised thousands for Compassion UK and decided
.that I wanted to set up my own charity one day

In September 2011, I was in a position where I could stop working altogether and signed up to Bible college full-time. My plan was to spend three years studying theology and training for the ministry and then become a minister in the church. My church was my family and I loved everyone dearly and wanted to work alongside my pastor who was like a spiritual
.father to me

My spiritual mentors began to have ‘quiet words’ with me about money. They warned me that money brings problems and I had to make a decision – God or money. This troubled me as I felt compelled to be a successful investor and entrepreneur. My heart was to help people but I questioned myself because lots of their teaching and sermons were about the poor
.being blessed and the rich being greedy

While at college I began studying the Bible’s teaching about money and possessions and wrote a dissertation on biblical economics. I came to the conclusion that money is just a tool and as long as you are generous and hold it loosely, it’s a very good tool that can bring a lot of positive change,
.both in your personal life and in the life of others around you

I began to feel like a rebel and felt distanced from my church and college which hurt me a lot. My pastor told me that I was arrogant and needed humility. He told me to submit to the church properly and stop running
.ahead with my overly zealous visions. I told him I wouldn’t

,I said

Pastor, I love you and respect you. However, I will not stop doing what I“
”.believe God has called me to do

.As a result he got very annoyed and dismissed me from the meeting

After weeks of awkwardness and feeling unwelcome at church, I left alone, I felt betrayed. I wanted my family back. I wanted things to be like they
