

when people are successful at something, they deliberately overcomplicate it and make it sound harder than it is. I'm not sure whether it's to make them look clever or to scare off the competition, but whatever the reason, .I've seen it time and time again

I'm about to take great delight in exposing all the myths around HMOs and giving you the absolute truth as to how you can get crazy high returns and .become financially free by investing in as little as three properties

The builder lied to me

The first time I found out about HMOs was when my mentor was buying one back when I was a teenager, as I mentioned in Chapter 1. We'd become friends with a builder whom we will call Chris. Chris specialised in HMOs .and he really seemed to know his stuff

My mentor was on track to buy a 5-bed HMO in Birmingham that was in a bad condition and needed knocking back to the brick. Chris would do the conversion and I would subsequently manage it. I was doing this purely for .experience

I remember having a meeting with the two of them and Chris was ,explaining how important it was to have an en suite in every room. He said

Unless you want scumbags in your house, you absolutely need en suites in“ ”.all of the bedrooms

Chris also told us that buying a property in good condition was silly because you would pay over the odds for it. It was much smarter to buy a cheap run-down property and add value to it. Looking back, it's obvious that Chris just wanted more money for the works, but at the time it seemed .so convincing and right

My mentor paid £125,000 for the house and in excess of £50,000 for the renovation. His total investment came to approximately £81,250. I rented the property out for £1,750 per month. The rooms were small and the en suites were crammed in. This is not a bad investment, but when discovering
